This and That

By Shane Matzen

Hard Court Herald Editor

Marquette High School

Since I spoke with (wrote to you) last, JUST...A...COUPLE things have happened. This writer, who opined in previous issues not long ago to just get to sit on the bench in a district championship, got to ride the bus to a State Tournament. Needless to say, I'm still pinching myself over that one. Also, I just completed a goal of mine which was to go to Puxico, MO and find out some more about a team that, ever since I read Matt Chaney's book back in 1994, I've been fascinated with. Finally, I'll hit you with some of my usual pre-summer recommendations for taking your team to get better.

Back in January when I was putting together the last newsletter, our team was sort of paddling upstream in this river we call a season. Eventually, we'd get to (fall to) 11-10 and were being faced with a #5 seed in a 6-team district. I won't blow smoke at you...I figured the odds of us getting back to a district title game were remote at best. If we could just win a game in the districts (we were stacked up to have to beat three teams which had already defeated us going into the tournament), I could have lived with how the year would end. Instead, our guys just kept supporting each other, believing that they could be successful and I did the best thing I could do: I just stayed out of their way. As someone who has now been able to call himself the coach of a Final Four team, I think the thing I learned that sticks out to me is this: It can happen for any school, any team and any coach.

Several years ago, I was talking to Rich Rogers, a former Cub Martin Assistant Coach of the Year, who has been the lead assistant at Parkway West for years. He was listening to my frustrations and moaning about my lack of aptitude for this business when he interrupted me and brought up a gentleman who I had a great deal of respect for, former West Coach Mike Pratte who many of you know. He told me Mike worked hard year after year when West opened and ended the season in a negative way (i.e. with a loss in districts) year after year before finally breaking through fifteen years after the program began. I always kept that in the back of my mind as I figured "if a guy like Coach Pratte who knew his stuff as well as he did had to wait, then a guy like me could certainly do the same."

The moral of the story is this and what I also figured out...you need to have some breaks to get to the Holy Grail (i.e. Mizzou Arena) and obviously a good team of players who can make plays. But, you know what? Four teams each year are GOING TO MAKE IT. The question you have to ask your team if they have the skill to be successful: "Why shouldn't it be us?" If a guy like me can coach a team to Columbia, then I KNOW there are a lot of you out there that can do the same. Thanks to Rich for keeping me sane in the quest. (Oh and I forgot...I'd like to go AGAIN!)

As many of you who have ever read this column or know me are aware of, I LOVE the history of high school basketball; not only in this state but anywhere for that matter. I took my trip to Indiana last year to learn about the famous Milan Indian team that inspired the movie "Hoosiers". It was a great trip, but it made me think back to reading the Matt Chaney book "My Name is Mister Ryan" about our own state's fabled Puxico High teams from the late 1940s and early 1950s. Those teams were every bit the story that the Milan squads were but other than Matt's book, a wonderful trophy case at Puxico's gym, a few trinkets at the Missouri Sports Hall of Fame and memories of the folks who lived those days...the story needed to be kept up by people my age and younger who can still appreciate what our state's hoops history has to offer.

Last summer, Matt Chaney met me at his Lake of the Ozarks condo to talk about his book for about 45 minutes on camera. He directed me then to his father,

Louis (Puxico High Class of '49) in Troy. Mr. Chaney invited me into his home and we talked about his playing for Coach Ryan back in the day and his two grandsons who are great athletes at Troy sat in to give their take on keeping up the Chaney sports tradition. Finally, this month, I finally made my way down to Puxico itself to find out what I could about the legend. Leon Cookson, an uncle of Mike Cox (father to two of my guards at Marquette over the years in Matt and Mitch), took me around Arnold Ryan Gymnasium, brought out keepsakes that he had collected (including wearing his great letter jacket!) and we enjoyed lunch together at Mel's Diner in downtown Puxico. All of these gentlemen are a part of an episode of my online coaches show ("Frailey's Mustang Mania" at www.mustangmaniashow.com) that is available online at the link included here—go to "Season Three" once you're on the site. Their pride in their town and school and history are apparent. I won't spoil the story here in this article but if you have time, I highly recommend viewing the episode to find out that we have a rich heritage of hoops here in this state---one we should all be proud of!

Finally, I use this little corner of cyberspace at times to help out those who help me. If you're looking for a great place to take your teams this summer, please take the time to check out the following camps and shootouts where my Mustangs have been treated great and have had a very good summer experience:

Q&A WITH THE DIFFERENCE-MAKERS

NEAL HOOK

ST JOSEPH CENTRAL HIGH SCHOOL

Neal has served the MBCA as its president for the past three years (2010-2012) and has been the long-time boys coach at St Joseph Central High School while teaching math (1990-present) and being married to his wife Diane during that span as well. He takes on a new responsibility this upcoming school year as he accepted the Athletic Director position at Central after a successful career guiding the Indians on the hardwood.

Hard Court Herald: I think a lot of us who have been coaching for awhile have in the back of our heads a certain anxiety about life after coaching. As you enter into this phase after a long career on the sidelines and on into the athletic director's chair, what do you expect you will miss most about coaching?

Neal Hook: The relationships that I have developed with all the players and coaches. The countless hours spent in the gym working on player and team development. I love teaching the game of basketball and the character building opportunities that were available in the daily contact with the team. I'll definitely miss the times spent with fellow coaches sharing ideas and strategies, comparing war stories, and evaluating or replaying game situations. Not being on the sideline will be difficult but I'll certainly remain involved, just from a different perspective.

HCH: The past couple of years with you serving as president of the MBCA has been somewhat tumultuous with the passing of Gary Filbert. Can you give the membership an idea of what your time has been like on the job and what changes the association has gone through?

NH: The loss of Coach Filbert was significant on so many levels. We lost a great man. He was the face of the MBCA. He established the association in 1988 with a vision that has grown to what we have today. Through his friendship and commitment to coaches and basketball, Coach inspired many coaches with his purposed to “promote basketball in the state of Missouri.” He encouraged coaches to think outside the box to expand the opportunities for coaches and players. Today, through his efforts, we sponsor events that recognize the accomplishments of our student/athletes and coaches across the state. Coach Filbert was the Executive Secretary, treasurer, event organizer, and historian since our inception. With his passing, several board members were required to band together to fulfill the duties necessary to maintain the association’s progress during this transition. As president, I had a very small in the equation of keeping the MBCA running smoothly while protecting the legacy of Coach Filbert. The successful transition is credited to the numerous hours invested by the tremendous MBCA board of volunteer coaches. The MBCA has now become an incorporated, not-for-profit organization with Federal and State tax exemption. An Executive Board has been appointed to assist in decision making on vital issues, and sponsorship has expanded to help support the many events the association offers. Charitable contributions have increased to lend support to the worthy causes within the state. More scholarships have been made available for student/athletes to earn through their accomplishments. The Missouri Challenge has grown into an elite all-star event for the state’s outstanding seniors. A special THANK YOU is necessary to our executive director, David Fox, the executive board, and all the members that have joined together to preserve our association and assisted in the continual advancement of the MBCA.

HCH: The clinic has become the signature event for the association. Please expand on where the idea was born, how far we've come with the event and how we stack up with other associations across the country.

NH: The clinic is a vital part of the MBCA. In the fall of 2005, I remember past presidents Jay Blossom and David Fox proposing to the board a fall basketball clinic sponsored by our association. The idea was sparked by their attendance at the Iowa Basketball Associations clinic that year and the decline of involvement at the University of Missouri’s most recent clinic. The board agreed and approved. Led by Coach Blossom and Coach Fox, the board worked hard for a year and in the fall of 2006 the MBCA hosted its first basketball clinic at Columbia College with nearly 700 in attendance. In six years, the clinic has grown to over 1300 members and is recognized as one of the premier basketball clinics in the Midwest. The clinic has increased the membership of the MBCA and is generating the majority of the association’s annual operating budget. Our fall basketball coach’s clinic is the foundation of the MBCA.

HCH: Please tell us about the MBCA events which have become fixtures on the calendar and where those events stand at present.

NH: In 1988, the MBCA had a Hall of Fame enshrinement as its signature event. The Hall of Fame continues to be one of our more prestigious events but the past 25 years the association has evolved to sponsoring eight major events throughout the year. The MBCA tips-off the basketball season with the highly acclaimed coaches clinic in early October. The Norm Stewart Classic in December and the Gary Filbert Classic in January have become significant fund raising events for the American Cancer Society. In March, the MBCA hosts a hospitality room at the Missouri State High School Activities Association Final Four weekends and sponsors a coach’s brunch at the NCAA Final Four. The Hall of Fame inductions combined with the end of year MBCA awards ceremony to recognize the Academic All State teams, Mr./Miss Show-me players, coaches of the year, and the lifetime achievement award are held in late April. The Missouri Challenge All Star tournament showcases the top seniors in the state on Memorial Day weekend in May. The MBCA has become a very active member of the National High School Basketball Coaches Association (NHSBCA) the past couple years with meeting in June. And finally, the executive board meets in July to recap the past year and begin preparation for another successful year in the lives of our basketball coaches.

HCH: What opportunities are out there for our membership who wish to become more involved than just sending in their fees and attending the clinic?

NH: Being a part of the MBCA has given me the opportunity to meet a lot of outstanding coaches. I have tremendous friends because of our involvement in the association. There is more to being a member than just attending the clinic, a member can become a district representative, coach in the Missouri Challenge, work on committees for our events, and/or become an active participant on the board to name a few of the opportunities. The MBCA membership now includes an automatic membership in the NHBSCA that is working to empower basketball coaches across the country. Our association is run by its members and is vital for coaches to make the commitment to become active in the MBCA to continue our progress. The Hard Court Herald (the MBCA newsletter) and the MBCA website (www.mobca.org) are valuable resources to highlight the numerous events, committees and positions that need quality coaches with the passion to promote basketball and our association. Any member interested in a particular area or just wanting to become more involved should contact a district representative or a board member to receive more information.

HCH: Finally, what are your hopes and dreams for the MBCA as we move forward?

NH: My hopes and dreams for the MBCA include the continual support for our coaches and student/athletes. Increase the recognition of the high achievements of our teams, players and coaches throughout the state. I look for the association to continue to grow in number with more members, to expand the clinic and add additional "Classic" events around the state. I expect the MBCA to contribute more to charities and provide more scholarships to our student/athletes. I believe that our impact and involvement in Missouri basketball will increase corporate sponsorship to make this all possible. Essentially, my hope for the MBCA is to continue Coach Filbert's legacy and passion by "Promoting Basketball in the State of Missouri."

Hard Duty

By Mark McLaughlin
Missouri Mavericks Director
Hard Court Herald Columnist

The last few columns have been directed at “finishing” the vision and arriving at a point as a team where you first actualize, and then transcend, or exceed potential on the way to greatness.

Actualization is a hard process that takes time, and commitment, and singular focus. Exceeding oneself requires an almost Herculean attention to mental and “spiritual” components of a team that make them more than the sum of their parts.

I send a shout-out to the Madison Panther boys and my successor there, Jon Link, who won six games in a row before losing 81-51 against Sturgeon the other night. It’s been a real joy for me to see the guys that worked so hard to get through many difficult things the last two years get over the top and become a legitimate program, and I give the kids and Coach Link all the credit for finishing what we started there three years ago.

It’s “Hard Duty” to wander around in the wilderness for year after year after year without any perception or “hope” that things will get better. I’m witnessing a lot of teams and players who have really hit the January doldrums right now, beset by injuries, or a lack of cohesion on the team, or the more overt issues of jealousies that become resentments and resentments that become bitterness.

Discord plus dismay equals disarray. That’s not any fun for anyone, and when you have a small town that puts so much of itself into it’s school, the perception of an unraveling team brings out the absolute worst in human nature.

- 1) It has to be somebody’s fault ... “That” coach, “that” kid, “that” parent .... It’s always somebody else beside me.
- 2) This has to be fixed right now ... Heads need to roll ... Contracts are coming up in March so time to get the petition started and time to inquire if Roy Williams is available. If he’s not, we need someone else in charge.

As a coach, I try to insulate myself from the jibber-jabber going on in the stands. It’s generally uninformed, usually anarchist or conspiratorial in nature, and it doesn’t solve anything. But I know it’s going on, and so do the kids.

You complicate these matters exponentially if your school is also in turmoil. There’s a lot of that going on around the state right now, and a couple of particular instances in different places where the culture of losing is simply fed like cancer by a climate of upheaval.

Hard duty? Try to be a teacher or coach in a building that’s wrapped in more intrigue than presents at Christmas. It’s hard to go to work, people don’t know who they can trust and walk on eggshells all the time, and out of a need to “self-preserve”, whether you’re the superintendent, a teacher, an aide or a cook, you’re frequently confronted with making decisions about who you’re willing to throw under the bus in order to save yourself.

Superimpose that template over a basketball team that is pretty good, but not clicking, or one that isn’t clicking, may not have the talent to compete, may not have the attitude to work towards getting better, and may have a coach either incapable --- by circumstance, inexperience, or his/her own mortal flaws, to reverse the law of gravity when the rockslide starts downhill.

I think that in any organizational situation, like the body, stress manifests itself at the weakest (and most public) part of the body. Where bad cultures exist, and the climate is toxic, you'll see it come out in the team.

I've discussed in great detail over the 17-previous columns that being positive, staying positive, connecting yourself to the processes that help you win are how a good team becomes great. In the instance of a horrible team trying to be average, or a good team beset with a smorgasboard of troubles, I think staying positive and working through it is all you've got.

Coaches in this state are under greater pressure than, say, Iowa or Nebraska, and I say that from great experience. I believe school boards exert greater control in Missouri than they do in other states, so no matter the support you have from administration, one or two board members with an agenda who don't like someone can change your life ... Been there, done that, have the knife scars between the shoulder blades to prove it.

When any teacher in this state signs a contract to be a coach, he/she puts him/herself at an "enhanced risk" of looking for another job more so than any other person in education. I think we are judged differently, and often, judged more significantly on what we do as a coach than what we do in our classroom.

There are coaches that really deserve to be fired. The coach using drugs (he's out there) and then just launching into his players. The coach who promotes a player to significant playing time because of who his mom or dad is, despite the fact that other players may be better. The coach who verbally or psychologically berates or abuses players.

Those guys deserve to go.

There's no getting around the fact that coaches are evaluated on a "results oriented" model in a lot of places. The wins and losses are the first criteria, and it explains why the coach who uses drugs and regularly verbally abuses players keeps his job ... he wins. Good, high-quality people often are let go because of simple wins and losses ... the numbers aren't good enough.

So the hard duty we face is this. Every one of us who takes a coaching job in Missouri takes on the task the only way we know how. We study, we work, we commit to the process. So much of building a program involves making people who haven't worked hard want to, and helping people have faith in something they can't see yet ... a dream, a proposition that it can be better than it's been.

I believe all the odds were against the kids at Madison breaking through. But the administration was supportive, the majority of parents stood by the coaches, I the last two years and Jon this year, and the community encouraged their work and effort, and it's paying off for them now. They did everything I asked of them (even though they didn't always like it), and they've obviously done what Jon asked of them this year, and they're seeing the fruits of hard work and investment start to pay off.

For communities, players, and schools, here's my recommendations to you if you don't feel you're where you need to be with your program right now:

- 1) Give your coach a chance to finish what he started ... If he treats the kids right, even if he's hard on them when they need it, hang in there with him.
- 2) Trust the recommendations of your administrators ... You hired your superintendent, principals and athletic directors to oversee your program. Step back, and let them make the judgment in the best interest of the program. Just because a parent barks about this or that, unless it's obvious abuse, if the administration, in their due diligence puts forward a teacher for rehire, school boards need to trust the people they placed in a position of oversight.

- 3) The coach cannot build a program or make systemic positive changes without the commitment of the players to put in the work in the off-season... No coach can force players to do anything in the summer or off-season, especially if parents don't support that. A coach can progress to a degree between November and March, but the greatest gains happen between March and November. Administration, school boards, and the parent group need to come to consensus and either support the coach and account for full participation, or lacking participation by the players, and take that into account when it comes time to recommend in the spring.
- 4) If your school is in turmoil, parents are aligned against coaches, teachers, the board or the administration, or conversely, the school has built a "siege tower" unresponsive to the community, understand this ... Wherever there are hot, angry factions of people on separate sides, it's going to come out when your kids play. You will see this directly manifest itself. Don't throw bombs around your school and not expect collateral damage to your team. Don't unload a hard-working coach in this circumstance even if he's not having success. Give the guy a medal for going to work every day with a smile on his face and trying hard with and to help your kids.
- 5) To the players when it's going rough --- Holding others down to hold yourself up hurts everyone, you included. You cannot do harm to someone else without doing harm to yourself. Nobody cares about your points or your awards and honors if you don't help others be successful. Three months from now, people won't remember your 30-point night that came on the night of a 30-point loss because you're jealous of someone and don't want to work with them.
- 6) If your teachers and coaches are revolving in and out every two years, or less, your school gets a reputation of being "coach-hostile" and good ones won't want to come there. A conscientious new coach needs three years of grace, and then at least one more year before tenure. If as a school, it's your policy not to award tenure for the sake of not awarding tenure, be up front with that in the interview. It's a question that most guys won't ask in the interview, but it's creeping into more and more hiring and firing decisions at the end of year four, and it's unfair to the coach and his or her family.

This is a hard job that we do as coaches, and a lot of times, things completely out of our control make that harder than it should be, or has to be. There's still time to turn things around, and before some of you put on the robes and hoods, sharpen your pitchforks and light your torches to go lynch a coach, think hard about these things.

This is a hard job that we do. Volatile schools and communities can make it impossible. Just something to tuck away and keep in mind.

To school boards, a simple idea ... Do the right thing. You may have your own agenda and you ran on it, got elected for it ... you're out to "get 'em". Step back, pray about it, and think hard before you use the political "power" you have to ruin someone's life or career that did nothing to deserve that.

The truth has no agenda. This job is hard, and if a person cares about kids, works hard, and has the support of the people who hired him, think twice before you let him go.

SUGGESTED DRILL

The old Cincinnati continuous fast break

Many drills that teach the individual skills required to play the game have emerged over the years; however, Ed Jucker, of Cincinnati fame, devised the best drill of them all, which we call the "Old Cincinnati Continuous Fast Break Drill." I recommend its introduction the first day of practice and part of every practice session, thereafter.

Instructions:

This drill requires eleven players as shown in Diagram 1.

Three players, 5, 6, and 7 take the ball down-court on a fast break.

X1 and X2 defend the break from the tandem position. The player on top challenges the ball, the back player takes the first pass, and the top player drops off to the side opposite the pass.

When the shot is taken, all five players (X1, X2, 5, 6, and 7) become rebounders. Whichever player that gets the rebound makes an outlet pass to the side to either X3 or X4, preferably to the side nearest the rebounder. The other outlet, not receiving the pass, cuts to the middle, filling the center lane on the fast break in the opposite direction.

The rebounder fills the remaining outside lane for the fast break in the opposite direction. It is important that these three fast breaking players quickly get the ball to the middle with the least amount of dribbling as possible and stay widely spread apart. Coach McCutchan always insisted that both players filling the outside lanes keep within one foot of the sideline until reaching the free throw line extended at the other end of the floor.

The four remaining players, of the five crashing the board for a rebound, fill in the four positions, two in tandem in the free throw lane, and two as outlets on the sides.

The drill continues without break until the coach is satisfied with the offense, defense, ball handling, rebounding, passing, dribbling, shooting, and floor positions.

The purpose of this drill is to teach the fast break and the defense against it. This is a foundation on which to build your basketball system. The habits developed by drilling are applied in every situation that arises during the course of a basketball game. From the grade school level to professional the fundamentals of dribbling, passing, shooting, and individual guarding must be automatic.

At the grade and high school level you must rely upon these basic skills; however, you should try to make sliding through, going tandem, boxing out, cutting off a screen, and helping out automatic, too. It requires constant practice to perform these functions without thinking. In my opinion, there are no short cuts to the road of success.
